

LUNAR LETTER

Relationship Spread Sample

Tarot Report / Sample Report

Fictional case

Client: Avery
Question: What should I understand about the pattern I keep repeating in relationships?

This sample shows how a finished digital report reads when it is written for one person, one question, and one interpretive frame. It is not a list of features.

Important note

How to read this sample

This is a fictional demonstration report. A paid Lunar Letter report is prepared from the customer's own information, question, and submitted details.

The report uses symbolic and reflective frameworks. It does not provide medical, legal, financial, tax, emergency, psychological, or investment advice.

The purpose of the sample is to show tone and depth. It avoids copying third-party report language and does not promise guaranteed outcomes.

Digital reports are delivered by email as PDF files, usually within 24-72 hours after verified PayPal payment and completed submission.

If the customer's information is incomplete, delivery may wait for clarification. Customers should review Terms, Privacy, Refund, Disclaimer, Contact, and Cookie pages before purchase.

This page is written as if the report has already been prepared for the fictional client, so the interpretation is concrete rather than a placeholder.

Client snapshot

Starting Map

Spread	Five-card relationship pattern spread created for demonstration.
Cards	Queen of Cups, Eight of Swords, Two of Cups, Five of Pentacles, Justice.
Report lens	Emotional role, mental bind, relational desire, abandonment fear, and repair standard.

The snapshot is not the whole reading. It gives the report a container so the interpretation can stay specific instead of becoming generic personality copy.

Section 01

Spread Overview

Spread Overview

Avery's fictional spread begins with the Queen of Cups as the role she knows best: emotionally receptive, caring, and able to feel what is not being said. This gift can become a pattern when it is used to avoid asking directly for what she needs.

The Eight of Swords names the mental loop. Avery may tell herself she has no choice but to wait, interpret, and adapt. The card suggests that the bind is real in feeling but not as total as it appears.

The spread does not accuse Avery of causing every relationship problem. It shows where her own agency gets quiet.

In Avery's case, this section is not read as a detached symbol. It is read through the submitted question: What should I understand about the pattern I keep repeating in relationships? That question keeps the interpretation specific, so the report does not drift into a generic personality description.

The first practical task of this section is to separate pattern from assumption. A pattern repeats across behavior, feeling, timing, or visible choices. An assumption appears quickly and may be emotionally persuasive, but it still needs evidence before it becomes a conclusion.

The second task is to notice contradiction without flattening it. If one part of the map asks for movement and another asks for safety, the report does not shame either side. It looks for a step small enough to respect both needs while still creating movement.

The language here is intentionally reflective rather than predictive. It can describe a pressure point, a symbolic theme, and a useful experiment, but it does not guarantee what another person, employer, market, institution, or future event will do.

After reading this section, Avery is invited to mark three lines: one that feels immediately true, one that feels uncomfortable but possible, and one that should be tested in ordinary life before being treated as settled.

For a paid report, this is where the writing would become even more personal. The reader's exact background, preferred tone, constraints, and stated question would decide which details are expanded, softened, or treated as the central working thread.

Section 02

Desire and Fear

Desire and Fear

The Two of Cups shows a genuine desire for mutuality. Avery is not only seeking intensity; she wants recognition, exchange, and a relationship where care moves both ways.

The Five of Pentacles shows the fear underneath the pattern: being outside, unwanted, or left to carry need alone. When this fear is activated, Avery may accept less clarity than she actually requires.

The report separates longing from negotiation. Longing is valid. Negotiation still needs standards.

In Avery's case, this section is not read as a detached symbol. It is read through the submitted question: What should I understand about the pattern I keep repeating in relationships? That question keeps the interpretation specific, so the report does not drift into a generic personality description.

The first practical task of this section is to separate pattern from assumption. A pattern repeats across behavior, feeling, timing, or visible choices. An assumption appears quickly and may be emotionally persuasive, but it still needs evidence before it becomes a conclusion.

The second task is to notice contradiction without flattening it. If one part of the map asks for movement and another asks for safety, the report does not shame either side. It looks for a step small enough to respect both needs while still creating movement.

The language here is intentionally reflective rather than predictive. It can describe a pressure point, a symbolic theme, and a useful experiment, but it does not guarantee what another person, employer, market, institution, or future event will do.

After reading this section, Avery is invited to mark three lines: one that feels immediately true, one that feels uncomfortable but possible, and one that should be tested in ordinary life before being treated as settled.

For a paid report, this is where the writing would become even more personal. The reader's exact background, preferred tone, constraints, and stated question would decide which details are expanded, softened, or treated as the central working thread.

Section 03

Justice as Repair

Justice as Repair

Justice appears as the repair card. It asks for accuracy, boundaries, and agreements that can be named. Love is not measured only by feeling here. It is measured by whether both people can take responsibility.

For Avery, Justice may feel less romantic than the Queen of Cups, but it protects the part of her that has been over-giving.

The card suggests a clear question: What agreement would make care observable rather than assumed?

In Avery's case, this section is not read as a detached symbol. It is read through the submitted question: What should I understand about the pattern I keep repeating in relationships? That question keeps the interpretation specific, so the report does not drift into a generic personality description.

The first practical task of this section is to separate pattern from assumption. A pattern repeats across behavior, feeling, timing, or visible choices. An assumption appears quickly and may be emotionally persuasive, but it still needs evidence before it becomes a conclusion.

The second task is to notice contradiction without flattening it. If one part of the map asks for movement and another asks for safety, the report does not shame either side. It looks for a step small enough to respect both needs while still creating movement.

The language here is intentionally reflective rather than predictive. It can describe a pressure point, a symbolic theme, and a useful experiment, but it does not guarantee what another person, employer, market, institution, or future event will do.

After reading this section, Avery is invited to mark three lines: one that feels immediately true, one that feels uncomfortable but possible, and one that should be tested in ordinary life before being treated as settled.

For a paid report, this is where the writing would become even more personal. The reader's exact background, preferred tone, constraints, and stated question would decide which details are expanded, softened, or treated as the central working thread.

Section 04

Pattern Integration

Pattern Integration

The pattern is not that Avery loves too much. The pattern is that she sometimes lets empathy replace directness. She senses the other person's complexity and then edits her own needs to keep the connection stable.

A healthier pattern would keep the Queen of Cups' compassion while adding Justice's clarity. The question becomes: Can I care and still ask for something measurable?

The spread points toward relational maturity, not emotional withdrawal.

In Avery's case, this section is not read as a detached symbol. It is read through the submitted question: What should I understand about the pattern I keep repeating in relationships? That question keeps the interpretation specific, so the report does not drift into a generic personality description.

The first practical task of this section is to separate pattern from assumption. A pattern repeats across behavior, feeling, timing, or visible choices. An assumption appears quickly and may be emotionally persuasive, but it still needs evidence before it becomes a conclusion.

The second task is to notice contradiction without flattening it. If one part of the map asks for movement and another asks for safety, the report does not shame either side. It looks for a step small enough to respect both needs while still creating movement.

The language here is intentionally reflective rather than predictive. It can describe a pressure point, a symbolic theme, and a useful experiment, but it does not guarantee what another person, employer, market, institution, or future event will do.

After reading this section, Avery is invited to mark three lines: one that feels immediately true, one that feels uncomfortable but possible, and one that should be tested in ordinary life before being treated as settled.

For a paid report, this is where the writing would become even more personal. The reader's exact background, preferred tone, constraints, and stated question would decide which details are expanded, softened, or treated as the central working thread.

Integration

Practical Reflection

Suggested next steps

Write the need before explaining why the other person may struggle to meet it.

Ask for one observable agreement rather than relying on emotional atmosphere.

Notice when empathy becomes self-erasure.

Use Justice language: clear, kind, specific, and mutual.

Let care move both ways before calling it connection.

A strong report leaves the customer with language they can use immediately and questions that keep the interpretation grounded.

The goal is not to make the customer dependent on repeated purchases. The goal is to make the current question clearer and more workable.

Service information

Delivery and Policies

Policy links	Terms of Service Privacy Policy Refund Policy Disclaimer Contact Information Cookie Notice
---------------------	---

Current checkout is PayPal-only. A real paid order should be marked paid only after server-side PayPal verification. The static demo can show the flow but cannot confirm payment by itself.

End of sample report.